The fact that the department has been renamed as set of processes and the Department of Investment and Public Asset Management (DIPAM) underlines the focus and the new approach of the government that what we are doing is management of investment. And, disinvestment for resource augmentation is part of that. There are nearly 235 central public sector enterprises (CPSEs), 160-odd are in profit, and only 44 are listed. Even if we take the value of the ones listed, they are commanding 12 per cent of the combined market capitalisation.

When the government looks at its investment in various enterprises, it has a lot of options available to use this investment for higher economic activity and higher development expenditure directly or indirectly and also leveraging the assets available for resource mobilisation. The processes were the strategic disinvestment as an intent came in the last Budget announcement. The budget announcement and the set of processes and the mechanism were to be put in place, which has been done now. NITI Aayog is in advisory role. In the old process, there used to be a Disinvestment Commission, which used to advise the government on which CPSEs could be strategically divested. That means, giving up management control along with equity. The idealification of CPSEs, how they should be valued, what should be the mode of sale, and how much equity the government should offload, along with management control, are the aspects of which NITI Aayog has been given the responsibility.

The advice of NITI Aayog, with all the inputs, will go to the core group of Secretaries and Disinvestment (CGD) and Cabinet Committee on Economic Affairs (CCEA).

be taken. So there are executive functions and advisory functions. The executive structure is a three-tier process, where there is one evaluation committee, the CGD and CCEA.

How will oversight be process? We are creating an independent external monitor, which will be a single-member or multi-member entity consisting of credible independent people who might be from the government or outside. During any process if anybody has any ted to higher expenditure while keeping the fiscal deficit in place. Volatility is a challenge for the department, but we have to meet our targets. It will be our best endeavour to do so.
